FREW & CAMPBELL,

FRIDAY, MAY 7, 1875. Mr. Julius Verne in one of his latest books, has given to the world an exciting story of a party of balloonists but there is nothing in the vivid imagination of this author that will compare with the true racital of the last voyage of the "Zenith." The account furnished by Mr. Tissandier, the sofe survivor of the three distance of tasking it was the sofe survivor of the three distance of the bonnets of seven years ago; a great many black bonnets are still used, but the preference evidently is for light colors, and, with leaders of fashion for white bonnets. Science and its Followers. true recital of the last voyage of the "Zenith." The account furnished by Mr. Tissandier, the sole survivor of the three aeronants, contains a terrible experience. aeronauts, contains a terrible experience.

It may be these men were martyrs to science, the delity before whom at the present day we are expected fto bow, but the unactentific reader at least will give them credit for a good deal of fool-hardiness it was a grand experiment for these men to make in making an ascent into the upper atmosphere higher than any man had before dared to venture, and so far as their experiment was a practical one it deserved commendation. But it is as their experiment was a practical one ments have a tawdry look. The band of it deserved commendation. But it is shown that the same of the property of the same of the property of the same of the property of the same of t read Tissandier's account we thought that them; even those designed for misread Tissandier's account we thought that them; even those designed for midsumthere were limits to which even the devoteos to science should yield themselves. They go higher and higher, until at the beight of 7,000 yards they grow faint, ing from the back down to the waist are the height of 7,000 yards they grow faint, but they must go higher yet; they throw out more ballast, and it mounts again The Derby hat already described is the round hat sent out by the best Parision milliners. This has an ample high round crown with aufficient brim to shade the eyes well. This brim does not come to a point on the forehead, but is wide above the brow, and is rolled back from the edge all around. Black, brown, and Again he becomes insensible, and the balloon is once more descending, while his companions are buried in the bottom of the car, their mouths filled with blood At last he reaches the cord of the valve and the baloon is emptied and lies against a tree. Then Tissandier faints away, and thus these three daring men are found by the peasants of Indre. This is but a faint finding appropriate dreases for young girls just in their teens that furnishing houses are now making ontline of the story We have no doubt girls Just in their teens that furnishing houses are now making an extra effort aupply this want. Brown and Quaker grays are the accepted colors for these demoiselles as well as for their mothers; the fabrics are also the same, de bege and camel's-hair over silk being made up for them in plain colors and in plaids. The basque, ascque and long round over-skirt, or else a more fanciful apron, are the features of girls costumes. The plaiture waits to becoming to alight figures is also the note-book of M. Tissandier would horrify us in its contents. The Philadelphia Times quotes such as these: "We Times quotes such as these: "We are at the height of 6,000 metres. We are well. I felt the pulse of Croce-Spinelli. It beats 120 to the minute. The height is now 6,500 meters. A little oppression. Sivel throws out ballast. Hands frozen. Croce pants. We inhale oxygen. Sivel and Croce shut their eyes. They are pale. Croce says to me: "you blow like a porpoise," &c. And but the control of so on until the ballast is all gone. And these men were martyrs to science. We do not scorn their devotion for the world owes much to such men. It is cheering to know that the damage to winter crops and fruit by the extreme cold weather of April is not near so great as was at first reported. Besides, the prospect for large crops of oals, corn, potatoes, and hay are very good. From all directions we have advices of a greatly increased acreage of potatoes, oats and corn, and, with favorable weather, hereafter these crops will be very large. Prevailing high prices are sufficient to encourage farmers to do their best.
